

Here is a summary of the video and some important notes:

At the beginning of the video, two CACC employees administer the first injection, appearing to try first the right leg and then the left using the same syringe. It is unclear whether any tranquilizer was used.

Immediately, Chai gets up, almost knocks over a chair, walks at least 10 feet away from the original area, and continues to struggle while being held down by a CACC staff member.

A CACC staff member makes at least four more attempts at IV injection:

- 1 minute into the video
- 8 minutes in
- 10 minutes in
- 13 minutes in

Finally, the employee gets another syringe and does an intra-cardial (IC) injection -- known as a "heart stick." She then gets up and leaves Chai alone while she is still alive.

Chai lies on the floor alone with the syringe sticking out of her side, the syringe visibly moving several times. Employees step over her carrying brooms and mops.

At timestamp 13:36, the syringe sticking out of her body begins moving frantically. In the following minutes, the syringe continues to move periodically as employees step over her.

CACC employees walk multiple dogs on leashes past Chai while she lies dying on the floor, a cart full of dead dogs waiting a few yards away.

Employees pull a hose around her body.

At 37 minutes in, an employee removes the syringe from Chai. Another employee walks a dog past her body.

No employee ever uses a stethoscope to confirm death.

At 39 minutes in, an employee struggles to pull a heavy cart full of dead dogs closer to Chai. That employee and another staff member pick up Chai by the legs and throw her into the cart.

At 40 minutes in, two employees remove another dead dog from a run, carry the dog past a row of runs as living dogs look on, and toss that dog's body in the cart next to Chai's.

At 42 minutes in, CACC manager Canita Hardnett-Johnson comes around the corner, stops, looks at the cart full of dead dogs for several seconds, then walks away.

The cart is wheeled away.
